Yes, the numbers mean nothing to me as a resident. You could have included a setback of 3m, 5m, 10m, it would have made no difference. Stick to the point and make my call to action clear.

Ceiling height requirements seem low. Apartments are small enough as is, and low ceilings make a space feel even more cramped.

Q21. Would you recommend any changes to the standard addressing windows? Yes

Cross ventilation should be an expectation for an apartment. It substantially improves the feel of the apartment. Without cross ventilation, a place can feel stale and stuffy. It also means that it is likely that a good chunk of the apartment will miss out on natural air. Bathrooms have high moisture and natural air/windows help remove the moisture. There should be a standard imposed here.

The trade off of living in an apartment is outdoor space for favourable urban location (among others). I think this space needs to be utilised as much as possible. An outdoor area improves my probability of choosing a place to live significantly.
